HONGKONG, AUGUST 6th, 1906.

Since the Tientsin massacre in 1870, the hostility to foreigners in China has given rise to no more startling and lamentable occurrences than the Kaitum massacre of the 1st inst., in which eight ladies, one male missionary, and a child lost their lives. Lamentable and horrifying as the news is, it is not surprising. For the past few years, outrages upon foreigners have been perpetrated with almost complete impunity and with little or no interference from the Chinese Government. The outrages along the Yangtze in 1891, including the partial burning of the foreign settlement at Ichang and the murder of Messrs. Anderson and Queen at Wuzhou, as well as a number of other cases, were followed by a series of outrages that have occurred since then, have all been allowed to go unpunished. The despatching of a number of the Government's military forces to the Yangtze, and the arrest of a number of the Chinese, have not been sufficient to deter the Chinese from repeating their outrages. The Chinese, knowing by experience that the cost of murdering a foreigner or two or burning a foreign settlement has not hitherto amounted to much, and that they are amply prepared to pay it, they are now prepared to repeat the same. The British Government cannot stand by and see a number of its subjects murdered and its subjects murdered. The British Government cannot stand by and see a number of its subjects murdered and its subjects murdered.

Immediate object, it was proposed, being to enable the Peking Government to see the Foreign Powers in order to afford an opportunity for the intended rebellion. People of the spot had little faith in this explanation at the time and the history of the past four years has completely disproved it. China in a moment has been embroiled with Foreign Powers to some purpose, has been brought to her knees and humiliated in the dust, and yet of rebellion there has been none, but the old anti-foreign spirit has been steadily fanned by responsible officials and men of letters, and has broken out with renewed violence, resulting in the Shanghai outrages and now in the outstanding horror of Kaitum. Lord Salisbury, taking up the reins of office again after an interval of three years and finding the question of the safety of foreigners in China in much the same position in which he left it, all the fine professions of the Peking Government blown to the winds, and the hatred of foreigners more intense than ever. His Lordship wants a cool head, heads the Chinese Government will provide them for him without making much trouble about it, likewise a moderate amount of money to compensate the Mission for the destruction of its property, the injured for their sufferings, and the friends of the murdered for their bereavement. All this can be had for the asking, but it is little to the purpose. Let the rulers be dealt with as justice may require and due compensation be paid, but over and above all that it is the clear and unmistakable duty of the British Government to see that the Chinese officials whose connivance or indifference is responsible for the outrages are severely punished, not by some nominal deprivation of a riding jacket, or peacock's feather or any nonsense of that kind, but, if not with death, by some sentence to be carried out on British territory and under the supervision of British officers; and at the same time let the eyes of the Peking Government be opened to the danger of their previous courses by demanding large concessions, something that will make them wince and be more careful for the future. Our French and Russian friends have opened their mouths pretty widely in connection with the service they rendered China by securing for her a reduction of the Japanese demands; but England, open as she is widely in connection with the outrages of which her subjects have been made the victims, and while demanding and enforcing large concessions as a salutary punishment to China for her vicious conduct, she has refused to do more than to demand that the Chinese Government should be more careful for the future.
